Abstract

The High Country Magazine was created in 1967 by a group of writers in the Temecula area and was published quarterly until 1984. In 1984 the magazine, due to a dwindling membership went on hiatus, but returned in 2002 with the help of the Temecula Valley Museum and was now published twice a year. The articles and poems in the magazine cover local, regional, United States, and global historical topics.

Biography/History

The High Country Magazine was established in 1967 by a group of writers, who included but were not limited to Tom Hudson, Sam Hicks, and Bill Harker. While Ralph Love and later Roy Morrissey and Paul Price created the covers of the magazine. The borders of this High Country stretched from Temescal Canyon to the San Luis Rey River, with Temecula city in its center. From 1967-1984 this quarterly magazine covered local/regional historical topics and some general United States history. In 1984 the magazine went on hiatus due to a dwindling membership, until 2002 when the Temecula Valley Museum began publishing new issues twice a year. This new version of The High Country began to broaden its view and include global historical topics. Also, most issues of the magazine included poems written by numerous individuals.

Scope and Content

The High Country Magazine covers various aspects of local and regional history, with some general United States history. Articles and even poems covering local/regional history include towns, individuals, Native Americans, customs, religion, employment, technology, geography, habitat, vegetation, food, poetry, and even monster stories. Broader articles include United States political discussion, travel, and individuals. Later issues of The High Country expanded its focus to write articles based on global events.

Organization and Arrangement
